

Sinedrom's Rhizomatic Resistance: Détournement, Glitch, and Punk in a Digital Media Constellation

Abstract: Sinedrom is a digital media constellation – spanning a YouTube channel, multiple Tumblr blogs, and a Blogspot-based zine – that cultivates an explicitly anarchist, anti-authoritarian aesthetic. Through tactics of détournement, collage, glitch, and cut-up, Sinedrom repurposes media fragments into disruptive juxtapositions, deploying cultural hijacking as critique ¹. The project's architecture is deliberately rhizomatic in the Deleuzian sense – a non-hierarchical, multiplicitous network with no central node ² ³ – mirroring its anti-authoritarian ethos by subverting linear hierarchies and inviting participatory, acentric engagement. Sinedrom re-appropriates the detritus of “low” culture (pulp cinema trailers, underground comix art, glitch artifacts and other digital ephemera) as tools of resistance, turning cultural trash into insurgent treasure. This approach creates a productive tension between nostalgia and critique: the archive of trashy horror films, obsolete graphics, and campy pop culture is lovingly celebrated even as it is recontextualized to expose power structures and absurdities. Elevating marginalized or forgotten media is itself a political gesture, challenging the boundary between “high” and “low” art and rejecting the sanitized polish of mainstream digital culture. Stylistically, Sinedrom's collage of influences – from surrealism's dreamlike non-sequiturs to Situationist prank and détournement strategies, filtered through punk's DIY irreverence – produces a subversive vernacular that embodies a cultural critique of controlled digital environments ⁴. In sum, Sinedrom exemplifies how a networked, rhizomatic media practice can fuse radical art and political dissent, transforming nostalgia for retro-trash media into a vibrant form of cultural resistance.
